

Identity Maps

Your identity is who you are. Many things affect the person you are--your family, your friends, maybe even a book you read as a child. You are going to create an identity map that represents you.

Choose a symbol, something that stands for you--it could be a shape, a color, an animal, etc. That symbol will be the center of your identity map. Draw lines branching out from your symbol on which to write those people, places, and things that helped you form your identity.

There is an example below:

Your identity map should be large enough for the class to see from the front of the room. After you have created your identity map, be ready to share the information with your classmates.

Next, you need to create an identity map for Jack Mandelbaum. Use the information from Surviving Hitler and From the Heart (pp. 120-121). Be ready to share your map for Jack with the class.
